PORTUGAL: The end this week of the government-sponsored airlift of Angolan refugees could spell more trouble for Prime Minister Asevedo. Nearly 200,000 returnees will have reached Portugal by Friday.

The embittered and frustrated refugees have refrained from taking direct political action for fear of reprisals against relatives and friends still in Angola. Last weekend, however, a group believed associated with the refugees claimed to have made a bomb attack on the left-wing Angolan cultural center. The group, which blamed the government for the refugees' plight, said it had decided to answer 'violence with violence."

ANGOLA: With only two weeks remaining before the scheduled date for independence on November 11, fighting between rival liberation movements is continuing in several key areas.

In the north, the Zairian-supported National Front for the Liberation of Angola is trying to resume its drive toward the capital, Luanda, which is controlled by the Soviet-supported Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola. Destruction of two bridges has currently halted Front forces at the town of Quifangendo, 12 miles from Luanda.

In the south, combined forces of the National Front and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola--probably assisted by South African advisers--have taken the town of Sa da Bandeira and the port of Mocamedes from the Popular Movement.
